Accuracy strengthens its capacities by creating a Forensic Technology Lab.

Neuilly-Sur-Seine, 27th November 2017

Accuracy, the sole totally independent actor with a truly global reach in the advisory field providing advice to company management and their shareholders, strengthens its computer forensics capabilities by creating a Forensic Technology Lab.

In order to strengthen its abilities in computer forensics and electronic discovery, Accuracy has recruited a specialist team led by Rick Barker, a new partner.

This team, experienced in the latest cutting-edge analysis techniques, provides an international service.

'Based in Milan and rapidly composed of a dozen specialists of various nationalities, this team will have an international scope and be able to work for any of our offices. It will complement our current activities in the fraud investigation, anti-corruption, litigation and arbitration spheres perfectly, as well as those in the financial sector and large infrastructure projects,' said Frédéric Duponchel, managing partner and CEO of Accuracy.

Before joining Accuracy, Rick Barker was based in Dubai where he led a Big Four firm's Forensic Technology team covering Europe and the Middle East. He had previously held this function in London. He started his career as a police officer in Australia in the cyber-criminality service.

Rick said, 'Our skills in forensic technology are perfectly complementary to Accuracy's current range of services. We are now able to offer our clients, wherever they may be, services in analytics, discovery, electronic investigation and the use of 'big data' at the highest technological level. We can act in support of our clients' lawyers and/or their internal departments in any situation which would require such services.'
